Wwe raw roster 2020

0 of 10Credit: WWE.comThe WWE draft began Friday night on Fox, and while stars like Roman Reigns, Drew McIntyre, Asuka and Sasha Banks have discovered their landing points, there are still some notable superstars who haven't heard their names called. That's not because they're not that big of stars, but because WWE has to spread the amount of talent over two broadcasts. Who are the men and women who await their fate come at 8:.m. Monday night on WWE Raw on the USA Network? Let's take a look.

There is little upward trajectory for Wyatt's character on SmackDown, if only because The Big Dog will remain the focal point. Add Seth Rollins' arrival to the mix, and Wyatt would be subcorado by two of the faces of WWE over the past decade. Could he stand in the middle of the card and still be a force? Sure, but The Devil is such a superb character that he screams main event in a way that few do. Fortunately for him, he has the opportunity to go for raw, a brand that is in desperate need of high-profile heels. Randy Orton kept the top of the card here in 2020, but unless he wins the WWE title inside Hell in a Cell on October 25, his race is coming to an end. At least for now. There has been little commitment to AJ Styles as a sustained main event star since last year's red-mark race, where he competed for the Title of the United States before jumping to SmackDown and fighting for the Belt. Hurt Business and Retribution are mid-sized stables at best now, leaving a giant hole at the top of the card. Don't be surprised if Wyatt makes his presence felt quickly and presents the first real threat to Drew McIntyre's reign as champion. A big fish in a smaller lake, complete with a new on-screen relationship with Alexa Bliss, Wyatt would thrive on Monday nights in a way he won't get the opportunity on Fridays. Best Fit: RawBayley4 of 10It's almost unheard of that Bayley will celebrate 365 days as the smackdown women's champion having heard Naomi, Bianca Belair, Mandy Rose and Dana Brooke. The Role Model has been as dominant, fun and consistently excellent as any female artist over the past year and really should have been a top draft pick – especially on a brand she ruled during that time. But she wasn't. Perhaps this is an indication of how WWE employees see their star power, choosing to reserve their drafting until Night 2 to help pad the schedule. Perhaps it's a sign that she will lose her title to Sasha Banks in Hell in a Cell and become a member of the red mark, even if Friday nights suit her best, if only because of the ongoing dispute with Boss Whatever the case, the absence of her name on Friday night's call will be corrected soon Monday. Best Fit : SmackDownThe Street Profits5 of 10The Street Profits is a rarity: a home tag team that has become better and more prominent since it jumped to next's main list. His athleticism, charisma and popularity are undeniable, and his work to keep the tag team fight in a high-profile place, although WWE Creative apparently does what it can to minimize it is commendable. The arrival of new tag team champions SmackDown Kofi Kingston and Xavier Woods puts Montez Ford and Angelo Dawkins in a sticky situation, however. With real tag teams at a premium, it's highly unlikely that WWE will retain two babyface tandems of this stature in the same show when there are already so few teams. Factor in Bianca Belair - Ford's real wife - being recruited to SmackDown and you have every reason to believe that raw tag champions may find themselves swinging blue in the very near future. But that may not be the best move. While depth is a big problem across the brand, raw at least has factions from which it can build teams. Shelton Benjamin and Cedric Alexander could easily pose a threat, and any mix of Slapjack, T-Bar and Mace from Retribution can be problematic for the champions. SmackDown, out of Cesaro and Shinsuke Nakamura, The Lucha House Party and the ironically forgotten Sons, doesn't have much to offer tag team wrestling fans —especially with Saturday's revelation that Tucker had been drafted for raw, Heavy Machinery.Best Fit: RawSami Zayn6 of 10Sami Zayn is the reigning intercontinental champion and one of the best jumps in the business. Talkmouth, Big Mouth, when justified and willing to stop for nothing to achieve the desired result, he emerged from a long hiatus to remind fans why he was one of the most entertaining characters in any brand before the COVID-19 pandemic. Zayn didn't hear his name called Friday night on SmackDown, but he thinks he will remain with the blue mark on Monday, if only because a loaded midcard needs this league to help dictate their stories and give purpose to their stars. We know that Jeff Hardy, Matt Riddle, Shory G, Sheamus and King Corbin will not pose a major threat to the Roman Reigns at this time, but they make an extremely intriguing set of contenders to Zayn's title. Like the viscous heel of The Honky Tonk Man around which the entire middle card can be built, it provides incredible stability. That is, if Vinnie Mac and the rest of the writing team can resist the urge to take away his title in order to give Hardy an unnecessary or hot-shot reign between three or four different stars in the name of building toward complicated multi-man matches. Zayn is the key to long-term stability on the SmackDown undercard and should be one of the pillars of the blue brand. Best fit: SmackDownRandy Orton7 of 10 at this point in his career, it really doesn't matter where Randy Orton ends up. A veteran competitor who has done everything (and then some), it's less about where he is and more about whether he feels creatively accomplished. In 2020, Viper did some of his best work. Whether it's Edge's shocking betrayal or the vile, manipulative heel that targeted Drew McIntyre's WWE Championship, he became one of raw's centepieces, elevating a show that has been a chore to watch at times. With Roman Reigns and Seth Rollins holding the main scene of the event as their main jumps on Friday nights, why bother changing something that's working well? Keep Orton on Monday nights, even if it implies a hiatus after his longest, uninterrupted run in years. Best Fit: RawBraun Strowman8 of 10Braun Strowman's run as universal champion seems an eternity behind, even though it only ended at SummerSlam on August 23. This is an indictment of the way WWE Creative followed what should have been the longest sequence of his career. Instead of keeping him hanging around the title photo, he ended up floating to the red mark, where he competed on Raw Underground a few times and then involved Keith Lee in an abbreviated battle last week. This Friday night, he challenges Roman Reigns to the Universal Championship on the premiere episode of the special season of SmackDown with little or no chance of winning back his title. So where does that leave The Monster Among Men? His recent appearances on Raw would apparently point to a period back on Monday nights, and that wouldn't necessarily be bad thing. There is a definite lack of high-profile babyfaces behind Drew McIntyre, and with the drafting of Rey Mysterio and his family for SmackDown, opens up a position for Strowman Strowman In. Of course, there is also the aforementioned Lee and a battle for dominance between them to be had. Imagine a tag team or improvised tandem from the huge Strowman and high-pilot Ricochet, a combination that could benefit both. Having beaten, or at least worked with, all the other blue mark already, now is the time for Strowman to go home and maybe rediscover the advantage he lost in the last year. Best Fit: RawKevin Owens9 of 10Kevin Owens is a former universal champion, worked with everyone from Goldberg to Chris Jericho and Shane McMahon to Seth Rollins, but he's been having trouble finding something of any real substance to do lately. He has had encounters with Randy Orton and is in the midst of an intense rivalry with Aleister Black, but it is the evolving program with The Fiend Bray Wyatt that has the biggest KO fans hoping for a return to form for the former title holder. The Wyatt show almost certainly elevated KO's actions before Monday's show, making him one of the Superstars to keep an eye on. Is he just a body for Wyatt to steam on his way to establishing himself a threat on Monday nights? Or was this Wyatt show designed to return Owens to prominence, perhaps as a heel whose world is forever altered by his encounter with the enigmatic nightmare that is The Devil? Time will tell, but one thing is certain: for Owens' sake, Raw is the best landing spot. A jump back to SmackDown either waters the middle card or prepares him to be beaten by Roman Reigns as one of the Tribal Chief's next victims. On Raw, he can continue flirting with the line between the midcard and the main event, all while enveloping fans with his talk show, which allows his personality to shine. Best Fit: RawKeith Lee10 of 10Keith Lee is at his peak, is coming off an acclaimed race in NXT and ready to be a top guy right away. He is an athletic aberration, a heavyweight who can move like a cruiser while simultaneously using his strength advantage to throw opponents of any size around the ring. In Raw, however, its growth is atrophied by the presence of Drew McIntyre; on SmackDown, he could instantly become one of Roman Reigns' top gold contenders. Once the universal champion ends his rivalry with Jey Uso, he will find himself without any natural enemies. Seth Rollins will probably be worried that Mysterio because if 2020 has taught us anything, it's that the only thing more persistent than COVID-19 is WWE Creative's love of this rivalry. Vice versa for Mysterio. This leaves a lack of genuine talent for the babyface to step up and challenge Reigns.A year ago, Lee was striking up with Reigns on the Survivor series pay-per-view, gaining considerable popularity and momentum based on his showing that night. Imagine your journey coming in full circle and challenging the starter this year. future is unlimited for Lee, but only if he spends next year on Friday nights. Best fit: SmackDown SmackDown
